The first months after the opening of Asian cinema in 1966 show a phenomenal increase in improvisation in cinema. During this time, there are a number of films that consist almost entirely of improvisation - such films as "Bikers" in 1968, "Race" in 1975, and even "Broken Flowers" in 1988. They center on a woman whose monster husband tries to commit suicide and who tries to stop him, mostly in the genre of melodrama. The movie "Race" tells the story of two friends who climb into an enclosed space in a super-fast car and, in pursuit of their best friend, face much more brutal violence. In 1977, G. Suri, the director of production, collaborated with the directors and screenwriters of the film, created one of the first Asian cinema trio, which included G. Mui, G. Nong and C. A. Bosa. The film was a big success in Thailand and was screened at the Cannes Film Festival. Other well-known films in which the roles of director and actor are equal or almost equal are Gompo Phammo's Gulliver and Fear House (also under the name Lightning Rod) directed by Lokir Suri. At this time, other performers appear, such as Nedarmava Chadbang (Shahman - approx.), who played the role of the older brother Ipolit, in whom the feeling of guilt lives, and the Thanmi Film actor, who played in the film "September" by the director - an anarchist film with elements of violence which attracted the attention of art critics.
