Here's a first for me: a political leader warning about the healthcare crisis. Six days before Christmas, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Senator Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) joined with nine other Democratic members of Congress in writing to President Obama and Health and Human Services Secretary Kathleen Sebelius to urge them to "immediately extend the protections of the Affordable Care Act to all Americans" by delaying the employer mandate. "We urge you to delay the individual mandate for one year, while transitioning affected employers to a regime similar to that of their small business counterparts," the Democratic lawmakers wrote in a letter to Obama and Sebelius dated Dec. 19. The letter, addressed to the president and secretary, was also signed by House Majority Whip Jim Clyburn (D-S.C.), Senator Bob Casey (D-Penn.) and Representative Diana DeGette (D-Colo.) Faced with an administration that has failed to set a firm deadline for when the penalties for going without insurance will kick in, Pelosi and Sanders are at the forefront of urging a delay to the employer mandate, the most contentious piece of the law that has roiled the healthcare debate. Yet the Democrats' call is also an acknowledgment that the recent death of Massachusetts Senator Ted Kennedy was not an isolated event. Though the law was widely panned by Republicans and some moderate Democrats when it passed in 2010, it has come to bear ever more heavily on the lives of the uninsured as Republicans have continued to press an effort to repeal it. Some 5 million to 10 million people, including many lower-wage workers, would lose coverage because of the healthcare law's employer mandate, even though it was supposed to lower the ranks of the uninsured. But in recent months, the lack of progress on a substantive repeal proposal has led to growing criticism that the bill was rushed through Congress in secret. Public officials and industry experts say the lack of planning made it unclear where to put resources and what to remove from the law. Healthcare and insurance experts say
