- One Year After the Great Flood As I shared with you in a previous post, my heart grows fonder each day. On February 26th, 2010, I almost lost all of it. At 3pm, the middle of the day, I was sitting on my front porch when my dog looked back at me with those awful, brown eyes and I knew it was raining outside. Sure enough, the rain gently poured for about thirty minutes and then it got harder and harder. As the rain stopped I opened the sliding door and was stunned. No sign of vegetation, plants or trees in my backyard, the maple tree in my front yard leaning over like it wanted a hug, the flag flying on the pole (sorry, it was in the other direction), trees in the front and back yards hanging over and the roofs of our homes with all the gutters and downspouts empty. It was a sight to behold. To make matters even worse, our house was fully engulfed. Water was pouring in under the front door. I called 911 and they put me on hold (still fairly normal, granted). At that very moment, our power went out. I called my power company to report the problems, and again they put me on hold. At 3:30 I called them and they apologized for the many many different issues with the power that day (I thought our power was going to go out, okay??). We were told at that time to not leave the house, other than to grab the few things we need. We were to call 911 if anything else happened, they said. It was unclear to me what this meant. I had never owned a cell phone and weren't sure when they were first invented. Maybe after the post office started taking my mail, I missed that part? Still in the house that day. In my brief call with the power company I was told they would send someone out to look at our problem. They were to come out at 6pm. They didn't show. I tried to call the power company again and I was told they were experiencing a blackout all over the city. I was then put on hold. At 6pm I called 911 and I was put on hold once again. I was told to sit tight and wait for someone to come out. No one ever did. We used flashlights, candles, kerosene lamps and gas-based lights to try to
