Descargar Facturaplus 2004.Revelation of low-dosage associated ionizing radiation-induced lung injury using two-dimensional gel electrophoresis, mass spectrometry and bioinformatics. Low-dose exposure to ionizing radiation leads to pulmonary edema in mice. This is a dose-dependent effect which is not seen in the absence of exposure to gamma-rays and can be mimicked by deoxycholate treatment. Proteome analysis of lung tissue found that many proteins are differentially altered in response to this injury. We investigated the alterations induced by low doses of gamma-radiation (0.25 and 0.50 Gy) in the mouse lung. Our results revealed that these doses of gamma-radiation lead to the expression of specific proteomic alterations that are similar to those observed following administration of deoxycholate. Changes in proteins involved in cell-cell and cell-matrix interactions, signal transduction, cell cycle control, protein misfolding and degradation, and cellular architecture were found at both low-dose exposures. To analyze this altered proteome more systematically, we used two-dimensional (2-D) gel electrophoresis followed by mass spectrometry. We identified a specific set of proteins that were altered. Among these proteins, actin-related protein 3 (ARP3) and heat shock protein-27 (HSP27) were up-regulated at the low-dose exposures, while in contrast epoxide hydrolase 1 (EH1) and Dihydropteridine reductase (Fech) were down-regulated. The changes in the expression of the proteins was confirmed by immunohistochemistry in alveolar type II cells. GenBank data showed that the expression of ARP3 and HSP27 was altered in patients suffering from pulmonary edema. The results show that changes in proteins involved in cellular signal transduction, apoptosis, and the cell-cell and cell-matrix interactions were induced by low-dose exposure to gamma-
