The present invention generally relates to devices used to measure, adjust and maintain the level of a liquid. In particular, the present invention relates to devices and methods for making and installing leveling gauges for use with above ground swimming pools. Above ground swimming pools are typically installed on a concrete slab. The slab defines the pool bottom and is typically about six to nine inches thick. The pool is installed on the slab by pouring cement into the bottom of the slab until the slab is substantially level. Cement is then poured into the space between the pool and the bottom of the slab, making a pool wall of cement surrounding the pool. It is not uncommon for the initial pouring of cement for a swimming pool wall to be somewhat off level. This is typically caused by the unevenness of the concrete slab, which is particularly pronounced at the edges of the slab. When the pool wall is initially poured, a leveling gauge may be attached to the interior side of the pool wall to determine whether the wall is level. The leveling gauge is typically made of plastic and includes a shaft that extends from the pool wall to a point near the pool edge. The swimming pool is then filled with water and the level of the water in the pool is checked by extending a measuring tape into the water near the pool edge and back to the pool wall to determine if the level of the water is the same as the level of the pool wall. In this manner, the level of the pool wall is initially established. At this time, the leveling gauge is removed and a simple pencil level can be attached to the pool wall. After the pool has been installed, the level of the water must be continually checked, and the leveling gauge re-attached if necessary. It will be appreciated that the leveling gauge must be re-attached to the pool wall at frequent intervals. The pool wall, however, is subject to expanding and contracting with temperature changes. This makes re-attachment of the leveling gauge very difficult. Because the pool wall can expand and contract within a relatively small temperature range, it is necessary to frequently check the water level in the pool and re
